This is another good book from Henry Winkler & Lin Oliver although I didn't enjoy it as much as the previous books I read by them.

The book is about Hank who was terrified of the thought of not passing fourth grade and desperately looking for ways for his parents not to attend Parent - Teacher Conference Day. Hank decided to enter a contest so he can send his parents on a trip to Philadelphia for the Stone Rock concert the same day as the parent conference day. Hank avoided giving the reminder note-conference from his teacher to his parents, which so happens to be the same day as the trip to Philadelphia. Although he wins the contest, Hank's next challenge is to convince his Dad to go on the trip. Luckily his mom loves the band and convinces his Dad to go on the trip. But Hank's parents return the next day and are able to attend the parent-teacher conference. After all of his crazy attempts to fool the adults; Hank learned that he won't be staying back but he will need to attend Summer school, which he is more than happy to do.

I would recommend all second graders and up to read this book especially the fourth graders since they can relate to it. This book is very funny because it shows how adults are always one step ahead of kids.
