

I Used to Be Homeless—and Here's What Everyone Gets Wrong About It

Homeless doesn't always mean living on the streets

I was homeless for the better part of 20 years and so I've lived a lot of places. Some of them are what you might think of as typical, like parks, beaches, overpasses, or shelters, but others might surprise you. When you're homeless, your first priority is finding a safe place to sleep and sometimes that means you get creative and sometimes to the point you're willing to be arrested because jail seems like a better option and someone may, may look out for you, there. In fact, I've spent months living in an outdoor public bathroom, an airport, my car, a deserted cabin in the woods, a high-school press box, and a storage locker (which seemed like a cheap apartment, it didn't really even feel like being homeless!). Perhaps the worst one was when I lived in a tractor-trailer; they accidentally locked me in for four days and I could have died.

Homeless doesn't equal uneducated

When people think of a homeless person they don't necessarily think of the guy who not only was a star high school athlete but also has a college degree—yet that's exactly what I am. I have a Bachelor's degree in communications from the University of Miami. And I wasn't the only one out there with similar credentials. There are plenty of intelligent people who, for various life circumstances, end up homeless. And even the ones who may not have a formal education have to get smart in a different way if they want to survive.

There isn't just one reason why someone ends up homeless

It might make you feel better to think that you can pinpoint the reason someone ended up homeless—say, drug abuse, mental illness, or criminal activities—because then you think that by avoiding those things, you're safe. In some respects that isn't wrong and there are many homeless people who struggle with exactly those things. But the truth is that everyone makes bad decisions sometimes and whether or not your bad decisions end in homelessness has a lot to do with privilege and not being in the right place at the right time, but the wrong place at the wrong time. Everyone is vulnerable. There but for the Grace of God go I... or you.

Not all homeless people are jobless people

Thanks to a high cost of living and low wages, it's possible for someone to have a job yet not be able to afford a house. At this point, though, you might be wondering why I ended up homeless for so long, even with an employable degree. There isn't a simple answer to that (see my last point) but the job market was very tight when I graduated, and if you didn't take an internship you were probably not going to get one. Not to mention, I was overqualified for most minimum wage jobs; even though I took, countless, many of them, over the years, just to have money to eat. And, I admit, I did struggle with drug and alcohol addiction. I got sober in 1991, thank God, however, and still experienced stints of homelessness after that and still am only a day away.

Some people are homeless by choice

The vast majority of homeless people are in that situation because they had no other choice but there are a few who would rather not be tied down to anything. After my beloved mother died, my father and his new wife, kicked me out of the house when I was younger and at that time, I decided that I preferred having the clouds for my roof and grass for my carpet. Plus, I am very spiritual, and Jesus was homeless, so I figured if it was good enough for Him, it was good enough for me. That wasn't always the case for me but there were times I preferred it to being enslaved in the World System.

Homeless people won't kill you

Hollywood and TV shows give the homeless a bad rap, making them look like murderers and rapists, but the majority are simply trying to find food and shelter—just like you. You don't need to be afraid of the average homeless person, you're far more likely to be hurt by someone you know. In addition, a homeless person is more likely to be killed by a "normal" person than the other way around. There are some sinful people out there who get their kicks from abusing, or literally kicking, the homeless because they are easy targets. It's an evil world, and people should be grateful they aren't homeless. I wrote in my screenplay and book, "The Archangel": "I could live in your house, no problem; but could you live in mine?"

There is a "homeless code"

If you learn one thing fast, it's that no one is going to look out for you and so you may have to learn to band together with other homeless people. The homeless do their best to help each other out, share tips, and stuff like that. Now there are even tent cities, homeless encampments, in some places. It wasn't always that way and I, for one, preferred to be left totally alone. There's also a barter system where you can trade for things you need without money. I'm actually working on a guide for homeless people to help them survive on the streets—all the things no one tells you but can actually make the difference between life and death.

When you're homeless one tiny mistake can quickly become a massive problem

When you have no safety net, the tiniest issue—an unexpected medical bill, an illness or injury, a lost wallet—quickly balloons into an emergency that can make you homeless, or if you're already homeless, make your life infinitely worse. An example I like to share is when I was living in my car. One day it got towed for a parking violation and once you're towed, you're done. There are towing fees, impound fees, parking fees... before long you owe $2,000 on a $600 car. So now you don't have a car or any of your stuff that was in it and you're stuck sleeping out in the elements. Sleeping outside can be a nightmare, especially when you're suddenly unprepared, which leads to other problems... One tiny mistake can spiral into a life-ending problem.

Homelessness and poverty kills

I can't tell you how many people I know die from a lack of simple medical care. A cut, a broken bone, or an illness left untreated can become deadly very quickly. Once, when I was being mugged [it was my own sinful fault], my attacker broke my jaw. I tried to manage but the pain was so intense I couldn't eat or sleep. The ER did set my jaw, thankfully, or else I probably would have killed myself from it. But while you may think that hospitals are required to treat everyone, the first question they ask is "How are you paying?" Which I can understand, since doctors and others worked very hard to get their degrees, but I didn't have money. Also, however, they discourage you for coming in for minor things and when they do help, they don't always do a complete job. They just want to help you enough to get you out of there, not to help you get better.

Dental problems are the worst problems

When you think of everything you need to be healthy, a dentist isn't usually the first thing you think of but your teeth are an essential part of survival. Unfortunately, when you're homeless, simply taking good care of your teeth is tough, much less getting dental care like root canals or crowns. Between a steady diet of affordable junk food, which in itself, I know can be addictive, and a suicidal hopelessness and depression which makes you not even feel like brushing, many homeless people must deal constantly with rotting, painful teeth. And when your teeth hurt, everything is harder.

Looking homeless is often worse than actually being homeless

If you look (and smell) homeless, everyone automatically assumes the worst about you and it becomes that much harder to find a job or an apartment or get medical care. Plus, police or security guards immediately see you as a problem or potential criminal. One of the best things I learned was to keep a cheap gallon jug and use an outdoor spigot to shower every few days. A bar of soap can last you months that way. Being clean can make the difference to being allowed to sit for a few hours nursing a drink in a warm fast-food restaurant or getting kicked out as soon as you walk in.

Being homeless doesn't have to be a life sentence

About ten years ago, I decided I was done being homeless. I was able to start a side business that I could do online, from anywhere, like a public library, helping people get on reality TV and game shows. (Interesting fact: I won \$50,000 on Wheel of Fortune and I've appeared on almost 40 reality shows! And most of the times, I was homeless when appearing on them) This money allowed me to start a new life. But I'm the exception to the rule. Escaping homelessness, once you're trapped in it, is incredibly difficult and resources to help the homeless are terribly underfunded and under-served. If I'm being totally honest, I still feel like I'm one mistake away from being out on the streets again and that's really hard to live with every day.

You. Can. Help.

People often ask me what they can do to help the homeless and I always say, "Do something! Just look around you!" When someone has next-to-nothing, it doesn't take much to help. You can start by not judging the homeless. Don't say that they deserve to be in that situation—no human being deserves that. God promises us all, "...food, clothing and shelter." But He also says that because we have a responsibility to serve one another. The Bible reads, in part, "When I was a prisoner you visited me...when I was sick, you healed me...and when I was hungry, cold or homeless you helped me." After that, donate to causes that support the homeless in your community, like local churches, job outreach programs, or other charities. If you'd donate to someone after a natural disaster, donate to a homeless person, they are living a natural disaster every single day.

Homeless people are people first

It's easy to only see the homeless as a problem to be solved or, worse, to assume that as long as you can't see them there isn't a problem. Instead, offer basic human decency—say, "Hello" and acknowledge the homeless when you see them. Talk to them. Be kind to them. Don't ignore them or pretend they don't exist. Loneliness can be deadly. These people are your brothers and sisters, they're people just like you are.
